Pork belly, burdock, daikon, carrot and konjac in a miso broth: about 12 g protein, 3 g fibre and 14.5 g net carbs a bowl, with under 3 g added sugar (from the mirin). Miso makes it salty, about 880 mg sodium a bowl.

Diet notes: Gluten-free with a swap: Use tamari instead of soy sauce and a rice or soybean miso (barley 'mugi' miso contains gluten).

Method TIMES = THE MOMENT IN THE VIDEO

1. Peel the daikon and cut it into 5 mm quarter-moons; cut the unpeeled carrot the same thickness. Slice the burdock 5 mm thick on the diagonal and rinse it briefly. Cut the konnyaku 5 mm thick, slice the long onion and cut the pork into 3 cm pieces. 1:48
2. Put the daikon, carrot, burdock and konnyaku in a pot of cold water and bring to the boil. As soon as it boils, drain: the roots are only half cooked, and the konnyaku loses its smell. 5:18
3. Heat 1 tsp sesame oil in a deep frying pan over medium heat and fry the pork until it changes colour and separates. Add the parboiled vegetables and toss until coated in the pork fat. 8:05
4. Pour in 600 ml dashi and bring to the boil. Skim off the scum (leave some of the fat), turn the heat to low and simmer about 10 minutes until a skewer slides into the burdock. Add a splash of water if it reduces. 9:48
5. Dissolve 3 tbsp miso in a little of the hot broth, stir it in with 1 tbsp mirin, 1 tsp light soy sauce and ½ tsp grated ginger, and heat just briefly so the miso keeps its aroma. Taste and add a little more miso if needed. 11:36
6. Ladle into bowls and top with the sliced long onion and a sprinkle of ichimi chilli. 12:55

> Tip Serves 2–3. In Japan it is eaten with rice and pickles; with plenty of vegetables it also makes a light meal on its own. Lean pork leg slices make it lighter. Add mushrooms or napa cabbage in season. Keeps 2 days in the fridge.

The method is a summary in our words, in English — the video (in Japanese) shows every step.
